Dr. Álvaro Fernández-Llamazares

Dr. Álvaro Fernández-Llamazares is a conservation scientist working at the University of Helsinki in Finland. He has spent most of his research career working with indigenous peoples in Latin America and Africa. He spent more than a year and half living in the depths of the Amazonian rainforest with no internet, no telephone, and no electricity. The Tsimane' hunter-gatherers hosted him as a member of their community and taught him all the basics of how to subsist in the middle of the jungle, including fishing with bows and arrows!

Much of his current work focuses on the cultural expressions of indigenous peoples, including indigenous storytelling and, particularly, music-making in several indigenous cultures. Being a songwriter himself, he is very interested in how music illustrates the profound connections between people and nature across the world. He has a folk band, called Nòmades (<https://nomadesmusic.wordpress.com/>), that blends elements from protest songs and tribal rhythms to denounce environmental issues. He aspires to participate one day at the Eurovision Song Contest!
